It was adopted on November 27, 1917 by the Constituent Assembly, and promulgated on January 14, 1918. It was promulgated by Rodolfo Çaçin, who also served as the first Prime Minister of Albania. Although the constitution established the unification of the Albanian state after an armed struggle which lasted for more than five years, its limitations had caused the Assembly to be dissolved before its full implementation. A coalition government was elected in June 1918, and through the adoption of a new Constitution in September, the Assembly was reestablished, and the Constitution became effective on March 27, 1919. The Constitution used the French model for its drafting. The Albanian Constitution remained in force until 1929, when it was superseded by the 1921 Constitution. Background After the Albanian Declaration of Independence and the creation of the First Albanian Legion, the Provisional Government of Albania (then in exile in France) published its Organic Law on November 11, 1912, and on November 24, 1912 the Provisional Government appointed its first Prime Minister, Mehmed Balluku, to form the government. On May 7, 1913, the Assembly of Monastir decided to establish a Provisional Government, and on September 13 of that year, Ilia Zogu was elected Prime Minister, with Scander Bey chosen as the Foreign Minister. The Provisional Government was formed in Thessaloniki, Greece, and was led by Zogu and Bey. Later on October 2, General Lef Nosi, the leader of the First Albanian Legion, was appointed as Prime Minister. With these moves, the Provisional Government established diplomatic relations with the First Balkan Wars countries, founded the Bank of Albania, and liquidated and set up the Debt Agency for the Organization of Public Works, establishing the basis for the war economy. After the defeat of Italy, the Allies organized the Conference of London, which took place on December 8, 1915, and decided that a national government was necessary to establish a national sense of citizenship and a sense of state. Anyone can help? A: you are trying to compile an old language (html) with a new compiler. there is a risk (and hopefully it's not really a problem for you, but a warning for anyone else who tries to compile this code with an old toolchain) that things break. if you say that your compiler doesn't support "some HTML tag" or "some CSS feature" or "optional libraries" or "optional features", try with a newer version and just remove the parts that don't work. when it comes to the actual error (which I can't read because it's in turkish): You can try to install a newer version of the libjpeg library (also called libjpeg-turbo) by installing the precompiled version of this library. If you don't have a jpeg library, try another image format. this is also known as "source code re-compiling". to take it a step further, you could install a newer version of the compiler. In your case, I guess your compiler is a version old enough that it doesn't support C99 (such as gcc 8.2.0). you could try the compiler from Q: Repeating pattern of point-on-curve sine waves I'm looking to find a formula that will go through an array of data (points on curves) and create sine waves from the resulting points. Here's a visualization of the problem: You can see that the length of each 'curve' will vary, as well as the amplitude and phase of each sine wave. If there are two or more points along the curve, they will cancel out at the end, and a single sine wave is the result. The end goal is that I could, for example, take say the top curve, and adjust its phase (like shown in the bottom left panel), and then recalculate a corresponding curve for every point on the original curve. I could then do this for each curve. At the end, I would end up with a whole bunch of vertical sine waves, all with different parameters. I can do this manually, but that's A LOT of calculation to do, and I expect that such a thing would be extremely common in nature. So ideally, I would be searching for a formula that could adjust any point on any curve, and would give me
