Stay on Top of Emerging Technology Trends Get updates impacting your industry from our GigaOm Research Community In a rare show of populist solidarity, the Wi-Fi alliance has sent its offer to the Federal Communications Commission to include unlicensed broadband networks in the next revision to the FCC's rules on "white spaces," which are essentially unused bands of frequency that are in the electromagnetic spectrum. In a joint letter to the FCC, Wi-Fi, the industry group representing 4,400 companies, said it had negotiated with the commission to include IEEE 802.11 networks and would like the FCC to adopt the changes in the next set of rules to be announced next week. "We are asking for public comment, which the FCC is soliciting, but also at the FCC we are also very interested in having a meeting with the commission to discuss this," said David Reig, who is president and CEO of Wi-Fi. "It's a fairly broad communication," he said about the request to the FCC. The amendment would clarify rules around unlicensed wireless devices (such as wireless power transmission devices) and how they can make use of white spaces. It's one of the FCC's most ambitious efforts to bring unlicensed broadband into the home and other places. "We have to have a way to make sure that consumers are able to use these spaces as well as connect to this kind of infrastructure," said Reig. Unlicensed broadband networks are the holy grail for the FCC, which has been looking for ways to open up unused radio frequencies to the public for years. This so-called unlicensed network is exciting for companies like Google(s goog), Twitter(s twtr), Skype(s sk) and Facebook(s fb). These Internet behemoths have long yearned to build out an infrastructure that can make use of unused Wi-Fi frequencies. In the current rules, however, most white spaces are reserved for commercial use by cell operators and the like. This has prevented them from being used for private use by consumers. The FCC has been talking about unlicensed broadband networks, particularly in the context of the National Broadband Plan, since late 2011. In April this year, the commission proposed the rules in question. To motivate consumers to buy new home appliances, the FCC wants to reserve a large part of the radio spectrum for unlicensed use. It says broadband in the home will create new markets, such as hotels, hospitals and schools. In order to smooth the adoption of these networks, the FCC wants to reserve some of these frequencies in the band between 1.9 GHz to 2.7 GHz for unlicensed use.
